

Dear Humble Bundle

Two things that I've always been passionate about have been creative, unique games and the transition between traditional and digital publishing. So when I originally heard about the humble indie bundle from a friend, I was so thrilled on multiple levels. The business model excited me; the games included were inventive, creative, and fun; and the whole purchasing process felt intuitive. Humble Bundle really embodies many of the ideals I, as a content creator, respect and strive for.

For over half of my career I worked on smaller projects as a contractor. As such, the nature of the projects I've worked on was extremely varied. These initial smaller-scale projects offered me a huge opportunity for learning and growth as I had to raise my creative skillset to the individual creative challenge, using the client demands and a personal passion for self-improvement to shape my education. I picked up and polished specific skills as I had need of them. I found seemingly unlinked skills like front-end development, design, illustration, project management, system architecture, ui/ux design, marketing; and explored how these skills inform each other and how together they can accomplish things not one can accomplish by itself. Two years ago, I started seeking out clients with larger projects and more ambitious creative demands. I haven't been able to go back since.

One thing I have been striving towards is the unification of my creative disciplines. Early in my career, I was interested in finding clients with very clear-cut problems that had very clear-cut solutions. As I've grown and developed, I've realized that few problems have a mono-disciplinary solution and that the most unique and powerful solutions are the ones that are informed by many methods and styles. I feel that my skillset could be put to good use at Humble Bundle and that the creativity and cross-disciplinary mindset would be an asset to your team.

Along with this cover letter, I've included my resume and have several professional references to offer upon request. I hope you will consider me for the position and look forward to meeting with you and discussing my qualifications in more detail.

Sincerely
